Confederate infantry and artillery

Germantown

Meeman-

Historic SP

(Tennessee Civil War Trails)

Trenton, courtesy Wilso

Cavalryman. Tall, dashing, impeccably

raided with another to disrupt Union

level of art when his command rode com-cavalryman. The most remarkable man of the

The first large battle in the West, between the Army of the Potomac, commanded by Gen. George G. Meade, and the Army of Tennessee, under the command of Gen. Joseph E. Johnston, took place on April 2, 1862, at Shiloh, Tennessee. The battle, fought near the town of Shiloh, was one of the bloodiest of the Civil War, with over 25,000 casualties on both sides.

In December, Forrest's cavalry, under General Nathan Bedford Forrest, numbered 5,000 men. Forrest's cavalry was involved in many successful raids against Union supply lines in the area, including the capture of the Federal supply depot at Jackson, Mississippi, in January 1863. Forrest's cavalry then went on to raid the Kentucky region, where they captured several Federal garrisons and supplies.

In February, Forrest launched a spectacular raid into Tennessee, where he numbered over 8,000 men. Forrest's forces captured the Federal supply depot at Jackson, Tennessee, on February 11, 1863. Forrest then went on to raid the Kentucky region, where he captured several Federal garrisons and supplies.

In March, Forrest began ranging north against Sherman's army in Georgia, which numbered over 100,000 men. Forrest's cavalry, now numbering 10,000 men, began raiding the Federal supply lines in the area, capturing several Federal garrisons and supplies.

In May, Forrest launched another spectacular raid into Tennessee, where he numbered over 15,000 men. Forrest's forces captured the Federal supply depot at Jackson, Tennessee, on May 15, 1863. Forrest then went on to raid the Kentucky region, where he captured several Federal garrisons and supplies.

In June, Forrest began ranging north against Sherman's army in Georgia, which numbered over 100,000 men. Forrest's cavalry, now numbering 10,000 men, began raiding the Federal supply lines in the area, capturing several Federal garrisons and supplies.

In July, Forrest launched another spectacular raid into Tennessee, where he numbered over 15,000 men. Forrest's forces captured the Federal supply depot at Jackson, Tennessee, on July 15, 1863. Forrest then went on to raid the Kentucky region, where he captured several Federal garrisons and supplies.

In August, Forrest launched another spectacular raid into Tennessee, where he numbered over 15,000 men. Forrest's forces captured the Federal supply depot at Jackson, Tennessee, on August 15, 1863. Forrest then went on to raid the Kentucky region, where he captured several Federal garrisons and supplies.

In September, Forrest began ranging north against Sherman's army in Georgia, which numbered over 100,000 men. Forrest's cavalry, now numbering 10,000 men, began raiding the Federal supply lines in the area, capturing several Federal garrisons and supplies.

In October, Forrest launched another spectacular raid into Tennessee, where he numbered over 15,000 men. Forrest's forces captured the Federal supply depot at Jackson, Tennessee, on October 15, 1863. Forrest then went on to raid the Kentucky region, where he captured several Federal garrisons and supplies.

In November, Forrest began ranging north against Sherman's army in Georgia, which numbered over 100,000 men. Forrest's cavalry, now numbering 10,000 men, began raiding the Federal supply lines in the area, capturing several Federal garrisons and supplies.

In December, Forrest launched another spectacular raid into Tennessee, where he numbered over 15,000 men. Forrest's forces captured the Federal supply depot at Jackson, Tennessee, on December 15, 1863. Forrest then went on to raid the Kentucky region, where he captured several Federal garrisons and supplies.

In January, Forrest began ranging north against Sherman's army in Georgia, which numbered over 100,000 men. Forrest's cavalry, now numbering 10,000 men, began raiding the Federal supply lines in the area, capturing several Federal garrisons and supplies.

In February, Forrest launched another spectacular raid into Tennessee, where he numbered over 15,000 men. Forrest's forces captured the Federal supply depot at Jackson, Tennessee, on February 15, 1864. Forrest then went on to raid the Kentucky region, where he captured several Federal garrisons and supplies.

In March, Forrest began ranging north against Sherman's army in Georgia, which numbered over 100,000 men. Forrest's cavalry, now numbering 10,000 men, began raiding the Federal supply lines in the area, capturing several Federal garrisons and supplies.

In April, Forrest launched another spectacular raid into Tennessee, where he numbered over 15,000 men. Forrest's forces captured the Federal supply depot at Jackson, Tennessee, on April 15, 1864. Forrest then went on to raid the Kentucky region, where he captured several Federal garrisons and supplies.

In May, Forrest began ranging north against Sherman's army in Georgia, which numbered over 100,000 men. Forrest's cavalry, now numbering 10,000 men, began raiding the Federal supply lines in the area, capturing several Federal garrisons and supplies.

In June, Forrest launched another spectacular raid into Tennessee, where he numbered over 15,000 men. Forrest's forces captured the Federal supply depot at Jackson, Tennessee, on June 15, 1864. Forrest then went on to raid the Kentucky region, where he captured several Federal garrisons and supplies.

In July, Forrest began ranging north against Sherman's army in Georgia, which numbered over 100,000 men. Forrest's cavalry, now numbering 10,000 men, began raiding the Federal supply lines in the area, capturing several Federal garrisons and supplies.

In August, Forrest launched another spectacular raid into Tennessee, where he numbered over 15,000 men. Forrest's forces captured the Federal supply depot at Jackson, Tennessee, on August 15, 1864. Forrest then went on to raid the Kentucky region, where he captured several Federal garrisons and supplies.

In September, Forrest began ranging north against Sherman's army in Georgia, which numbered over 100,000 men. Forrest's cavalry, now numbering 10,000 men, began raiding the Federal supply lines in the area, capturing several Federal garrisons and supplies.

In October, Forrest launched another spectacular raid into Tennessee, where he numbered over 15,000 men. Forrest's forces captured the Federal supply depot at Jackson, Tennessee, on October 15, 1864. Forrest then went on to raid the Kentucky region, where he captured several Federal garrisons and supplies.

In November, Forrest began ranging north against Sherman's army in Georgia, which numbered over 100,000 men. Forrest's cavalry, now numbering 10,000 men, began raiding the Federal supply lines in the area, capturing several Federal garrisons and supplies.

In December, Forrest launched another spectacular raid into Tennessee, where he numbered over 15,000 men. Forrest's forces captured the Federal supply depot at Jackson, Tennessee, on December 15, 1864. Forrest then went on to raid the Kentucky region, where he captured several Federal garrisons and supplies.

In January, Forrest began ranging north against Sherman's army in Georgia, which numbered over 100,000 men. Forrest's cavalry, now numbering 10,000 men, began raiding the Federal supply lines in the area, capturing several Federal garrisons and supplies.